ABSTRACT

Objective: The objective of this study was to investigate the antihypertensive activity of heterocyclic compounds against angiotensin-converting enzyme (ACE) through molecular docking studies.

Methods: The X-ray crystal three-dimensional (3D) structure of human ACE complexed with lisinopril (PDB ID: 10B6) was retrieved from protein databank. The two-dimensional structures of 10 selected heterocyclic compounds were drawn in ACD-Chemsketch and converted into 3D structures. The 3D structures of compounds were virtually screened in the binding pockets of ACE using FlexX docking program. Further, the chemical entities revealing the molecular electronic structures of the best docked compound (Compound-4) were explored through density functional theory studies.

Results: The Compound-4 showed the highest docking score of -26.6290 kJ/mol with ACE. The Hbond and non-bonded interactions are favored by phenylalanine, leucine, and arginine. The energy gap of 1.60 eV between highest occupied molecular orbital and lowest unoccupied molecular orbitals explained the presence of strong electron-acceptor group. Furthermore, the molecular electrostatic potential studies clearly envisaged the requirement of electropositive and electronegative groups are crucial for the ACE inhibitor activities.

Conclusion: The identification of good ACE inhibitors requires the understanding of the current ACE inhibitors. Thus, the docking interactions of Compound-4 and its molecular electronic structure significantly imply its potential as antihypertensive agent. However, further clinical studies are required to ascertain its potential toxic effects.

INTRODUCTION

In recent years, cardiovascular diseases have become a serious problem worldwide. The World Health Organization has reported an increase in the number of patients suffering from this disease. Hypertension is an important risk factor, contributing to other cardiovascular diseases such as blood vessel disorders, coronary heart disease, aortic aneurysm, and stroke [1]. Cardiac arrhythmia is another cardiovascular problem. An arrhythmia is any disorder of the heart rate that may cause stroke. Heart rhythm's disorders may be caused by genetic factors or occur when the heart muscle (myocardium) is damaged, sometimes by hypertension [2].

At present, existing treatments for high blood pressure (BP) are not very effective and are generally uncomfortable for patients. This relies in that the patient needs to have a very strict control in the dosage and in the moment of the administration of the drug [3]. Moreover, also, some patients have an unfavorable response after the administration, leading them to a fast BP reduced. One of the most widely used compounds for the treatment of hypertension is Captopril. Like many others on the market, this drug was designed with computational tools. Over the past few decades, computational studies, together with rational drug design, have become a critical part in the development of new drugs.

Raised BP, especially systolic pressure (hypertension), confers a significant cardiovascular risk and public health concern and should be actively treated. One of the major systems involved in the elevation of the pressure is the renin-angiotensin system (RAS), and subsequently, its inhibition will have beneficial effects to lower BP and improve cardiovascular health [4]. The RAS is regulated by a series of highly specific enzymatic reactions. The first enzymatic reaction in the pathway starts with renal production of renin that cleaves angiotensinogen to generate angiotensin I. Angiotensin I is then cleaved by angiotensin-converting enzyme (ACE) to generate the active peptide vasoconstrictive hormone angiotensin II.

Many ACE inhibitors are known to be useful in the treatment of hypertension. The search for ACE inhibitors that lacked the sulphhydryl group also leads to the investigation of phosphorus-containing compounds. The phosphinic acid is capable of binding to ACE in a manner similar to enalapril. The interaction of the zinc atom with the phosphinic acid is similar that is seen with sulphhydryl groups. The purpose of the study is to determine the ability of some derivatives as ACE inhibitors through docking studies and the derivative with the highest potency and understanding its chemical entities through density functional theory (DFT) studies might pave path to design of novel ACE inhibitors with potential inhibition activity.

METHODS

Ligand selection

A total of 10 antihypertension inhibitor molecules reported in the studies of Yu et al., 2015, were selected in this study to explore their chemical entities required for the ACE inhibitory activity. The two-dimensional (2D) structures of compounds drawn in ACD-Chemsketch (Version 12) [5] were obtained as simplified molecular-input line-entry system (SMILES). Further, the three-dimensional (3D) structures were generated and converted into standard data file format at "online SMILES convertor and Structure file generator" server [6].
